David Cameron has said that if Scotland votes 'Yes' it will create the greatest constitutional crisis since the Second World War. But amid a hysterical media and political reaction, are there any sensible reasons why we would want a split? Not really, but a look at the issue does make you think that we would be better off as a single nation. The UK has been a remarkably stable political entity for 500 years, with elections every five years and no more than one-third of voters actually changing hands between them. The Conservatives were in power continuously since the late 1950s, Labour for a decade and the LibDems for two. Scotland has only had a Scottish Labour government for five years. By and large, both Scotland and England are politically unified. The Tories are a party that spans the two countries, and we are one of the few countries that is both a member of the EU and the UK's biggest trading partner outside Europe. The same is true of Labour. We have the same NHS, local tax base and Criminal Justice System, and share a currency and central bank. If we were to break up, it would seem odd for Scottish children to go to English schools when Scottish schools are now so good. Scotland, even as recently as the 1970s, shared some of the same ruling elite as England. So, you might say, what is there to be split apart? You have to ask, what has been lost in the debate? What have the British established? Political tensions aside, they have very little in the way of common identity and traditions. Despite all that is claimed, if you ask most people from both countries what they are actually British, there is no real definition. The constitution of the UK is based on the Acts of Union of 1707, which created the UK. It was designed by those who had ruled in Scotland for almost three centuries, and was a compromise between the two parts. This included, of course, the right of kingship and the House of Lords. That is one of the things that is in common with Scotland. The Act of Union created the b7e8fd5c8
