The Windows of Photoshop In other software, such as Apple's iWork, the design is made up of pages or documents that are saved as separate files. Whereas Adobe Photoshop has the concept of a file in terms of its content, but does not have the concept of pages or documents. Photoshop's collection of files, all of which are saved in PSD format, is referred to as a folder. Each file in a folder has one or more layers that provide the basis for the entire image. As a group, the layers are referred to as a Photoshop document. For example, as a designer working on a brochure for a client who is interested in a brochure with a mountain scene on it, you would open the standard library folder and create a new document. You would create a new Photoshop file and name it Brochure.psd. This document is broken down into multiple layers, each of which is devoted to creating the particular content of the brochure, such as lettering, images, and so on. You could create a new layer for each of the items in the brochure. For example, if you're working on a brochure with lettering on the front and the company logo on the back, you would create three separate layers. This is where the concept of a Photoshop document comes into play, as you can essentially break down the brochure into separate file layers that are editable by moving, stretching, and coloring each separately. When the entire brochure is complete, all the layers are merged together to make one complete file. * * * All Photoshop files are PSD, which stands for Photoshop document. Getty Images The Ravens have a three-month old son, so getting to see photos of him was all but certain when the team returned from training camp in M&T Bank Stadium. Baltimore coach John Harbaugh got to spend time with his family, even if it was in plastic rather than oak. Harbaugh shared a photo of little Bo with a keyboard via Twitter. The Baltimore Sun's Jamison Hensley said Harbaugh got to carry a copy of his son's birth certificate. "I think that part of it was a little window into the fact that this is really happening," Harbaugh said of carrying the certificate. "It's happening to you and your wife. Your immediate family has a record of this. At any moment of your life, he could be in your arms. It's an incredible feeling. It's an incredible thing." For now, Bo's routine has been pretty simple. Harbaugh said he hasn't let him eat much, perhaps a cracker once or twice a day. "You have to be patient," Harbaugh said. "He's still a baby. It's a challenge, you're going to have to be patient. You will get to see him grow, that's for sure. That's going to be part of your daily routine. He's probably going to be playing more ball than feeding every day. He's going to be doing both." Until then, Harbaugh will try to get a glimpse of his family's baby and take some time to just soak up the experience. Safeguard Self-Protection Children and adults with autism have difficulty assessing risk and reacting appropriately in an emergency. A recent report shows these issues make some children and youth with autism 10 times more likely to experience serious injuries compared to the general population. While the frequency and severity of injuries to people with autism is often overlooked, untreated or misdiagnosed, the impact on their families can be devastating. These individuals can present physical, mental, and behavioral challenges that may keep them from being able to act safely on their own. A recent review identified the following serious health risks and behaviors, causing significant burden to the caregivers of individuals with ASD and impacting their ability to remain safe: Choking is a common cause of injury in children and youth with autism who experience challenges with oral motor control, speech, and understanding social cues. Most children and youth with autism will suffer some type of skin injury as a result of aggressive behavior. Some individuals with severe autism are known to engage in self-injury, while others will injure others by biting and scratching. A Review of Injuries in ASD In 2017, researchers published a study showing that people with autism are at 10 times greater risk of serious injuries and illnesses, such as accidents, fatal fires, emergency hospital admissions, and dental problems. The report was published in the journal Emergency Medicine and Trauma. The study examined the current state of literature regarding injuries in children and youth with autism spectrum disorders (ASDs), as well as the consequences associated with these injuries. The researchers concluded that people with ASD experience injuries and illnesses that are often neglected and untreated, which can affect their physical, emotional, and financial well-being. The study found that these individuals were 10 times more likely to suffer serious injuries, such as: Drowning Fire-related injuries Electric shock Fall-related injuries Car-related injuries Hunting or other animal-related injuries Poisonings Trauma-related injuries The authors of the study recommended that people with ASD and their caregivers be familiar with the risk factors for injuries in this population and that services be provided by experts with experience in autism. Researchers recommended the following to reduce risks: All parents and caregivers should educate their children and adolescents about the hazards of play and explore possible barriers to play.
