Photo: RNZ / Dan Cook About 6,095 police officers have been issued with body-mounted cameras, and they are being given a pair of "new style" black glasses for use with the cameras. Auckland and Waikato had been the first police areas in New Zealand to roll out the body-worn camera program. Christchurch's was the first of the country's biggest and most densely populated cities. The cameras weighed nearly 100 kilograms, took 16 hours to charge and cost about $10,000 each. The new model includes a lighter weight, a better lens and better video quality, which should make the footage more useful in investigations. Police Association President Chris Cahill said the data on the use of cameras would be important and would demonstrate whether officers were in favour of them. "Hopefully that will inform that collective decision made at some point when it comes to deciding whether or not to have body-worn cameras." Mr Cahill said officers would be pleased that the cameras were being worn more often, and that they would feel comfortable using them. "The cameras are absolutely compatible with normal police work. "The only thing they
